Whilst looking through some old DSI Newsletters (1987) I found this poem written by Pat Shaylor, thought you might like to read it.

Mary O'Brien is always aware
That fear waits for admittance.
The world has given her fame
Isolation is it's name.

Suitcases filled with clothes,
Eyelashes on the table
Under mascara she hides
From antagonistic eyes.

During the day she is no-one
The sunlight does not convince.
With the evening she dares to feel
When she is singing she is real.

Then gold in the veins of her voice
Ask for what she can never demand
And a million people see
The woman she's meant to be.

Thomas Lord Lovett.

Yes, it is good. Very perceptive. I wonder if Dusty ever saw it?
