Earlier we had a discussion about what Dusty was saying at the end of this quip about royalty not being confined to the royal box at the RAH concert. Fraser suggested it was "Well, Mary," as if she were chiding herself, and someone else asked if I would check with Simon Bell. I wondered if she were making a joke to the royalty in the crowd, as "Mary" is sometimes a nickname for gay men (in America anyway).

Simon's comment was: I'm sure Dusty was saying "well Mary!" to herself. It's a kind of "look at the commotion you've caused in the crowd". She wouldn't have made the "Mary" remark directed at Gay men.

I've no doubt it's definitely "Well Mary" and said to herself, Simon is quite right.

She also says "With Respect" just before "Well Mary" so she may have had some idea of the consternation the remark caused even without her glasses!

It sounds like bone marrow to me, too, but glad to have the mystery solved as well. Thanks to all you detectives.

Did they purposely leave the comment out of the RAH concert footage because it offended HRH Maggie?
Does anybody know when she said it? what part of the concert?

Renge, I think it was at the beginning of the concert.

I don't know if it was purposely left out for that reason, although it would not surprise me since the whole thing begins with "in the presence of HRH Princess Margaret."

It may have been Dusty herself that asked for the quote to be left out I suppose. It could have been thought that as the show was being edited for TV, then what was perfectly fitting for the occasion on the night, may not have been suitable for prime time telly. This was the late seventies don't forget, no one would think twice now. Also, if Dusty was upset at the rebuke from the Palace, she may have wanted to forget about it rather than have any more bother. A lot of fuss about nothing.
