I'm most intrigued by the thought of Dusty singing Kate Bush's 'The Man With The Child In His Eyes' at her Drury Lane shows in '79. I absolutely adore this song, but I'm one of those people who likes Kate Bush but at the same time can't really take too much of her voice. I wish I had heard Dusty singing it - it must have been amazing.

Was anyone there, and if so can you please furnish me with a vivid description of her reading of the song so I can imagine what it was like? I'll try not to be too jealous - I was only two months old at the time 😊

Hello young Rosie 😊 I can do better than just explain it. Here it is especially for you.

I was there. You have Humboldt's download so you can hear for yourself. Dusty gave a nice reading of the song. I think she sat on a stool to sing it and all you could see was Dusty in the spotlight -but my memory might be playing tricks. What impressed me most was that Dusty referenced such a new artist like this (and Kate was a favourite of mine by then). She also sang 'Lose Again' which was another of my favourites at the time.

However, I'd gone to hear Dusty sing Dusty songs and this was an extremely rare concert appearance. [I didn't know at the time it would be one of her last concerts.] So I was actually disappointed that she was taking precious time away from her own fabulous catalogue to sing other songs.

Oh shucks Rosie, you say the nicest things 🤗👍 What do you think of her rendition? Personally I love it and wish that she had recorded it in a studio.

I have shed a little tear or two listening to this. Thank you so much Humboldt. It's a very lovely reading - I really wish she'd recorded it. There is nothing like the feeling you get when you're about to hear a Dusty track you haven't heard before...just magical. There is something uniquely special about rare and little-heard live recordings as well - they sort of sound lost and secret and hidden, so that you can really sense that she is singing from far away and long ago. The 'Longing' recordings have that quality as well - like they come from a place nobody could ever reach.

Sorry, have gone all poetic and wistful...
