But no need to rush out and buy it because although they used the pic below on the cover of the paper, there was very little inside. The Weekend supplement was called "the retro issue" and Dusty's pic was the lead in to the sixties. In fact, inside, they only used her face from the nose upwards for some daft reason!

I am relieved to hear that. I was watching Sky News this morning and I was sure I saw the image on the Guardian front page. Getting onto the Guardian web site was inconclusive. Glad to hear it was picked up by LTD and we, abroad, have not missed anything. Thanks Sunbeam Awesome, cheers Carole. It's a bit weird just having a photo from the nose up, i mean her eyes are nice but so is the rest of her face!

Its still great to have tho isnt it and how true of the article to say that the 60s were 'Daring' it was a good time to be alive...think you'd agree eh Carole 😊 Also the 60's was completely Dusty!

Yes, it was weird just using half the photo on the cover of the magazine inside but good that they knew whose photo to use on the front of the paper to attract attention to it 😊. I scanned the article for references to Dusty but there was hardly anything. For those who want to see what the half photo looked like, and the cover of the newspaper here are a few photos.

our twinsets and two-piece suits, and celebrated our youth.

Life wasn't all minis and beehives, but you can't think about the 60s without recalling them. The beehive was a very strange manifestation, though what it manifested I do not know. It involved a process called backcombing, which created an unhygienic, matted, tangled birds' nest of hair, over which the hairdresser trained a smooth outer shell that was then blasted into stiffness with a toxic lacquer that smelled of formaldehyde. Late Night Line-Up had a coiffeuse who could do a brilliant beehive. I used to try to get on the programme as often as possible, just to have my hair done. Hairdressers were very 60s, and Vidal Sassoon was a symbol of the new classless society we believed was being invented around us.

Feminism arose in the 60s. It arose spontaneously, inevitably, and grew around us, and through us, without our knowing it for what it was. The 50s had been a time of outward conformity

A day or two earlier the Guardian had featured an advertisement for Smooth radio

I've listened to Smooth radio occasionally (must have been when i've been away) and can recommend giving it a try though it's not available everywhere in the UK even.

What a bizarre thing to do, using half of Dusty's face like that! Although I'm with Carole on the logo, which is actually really cool.
