Don't know if this question has been asked before, apologies if it has :

I'm just curious as to why Dusty's funeral was held, and why half her ashes are interred, at St Mary the Virgin which is Church of England as opposed to the Sacred Heart which is Roman Catholic seeing as Dusty was of the Catholic faith?

Was the choice of church Dusty's seeing as she organised her funeral before she passed or did someone else make that decision afterwards?

Perhaps Dusty's choice of church reflected her altered approach to her faith and religion as she got older. (no offence intended to any religions) this is only my take on the subject.

I think from conversations I've had with those who were around Dusty at the time, that Dusty chose the church because it was pretty and on the river! Nothing too religious in her choice because religion wasn't playing a big part in her life by then. But there was a Catholic priest in church along with the Anglican vicar. I'm told that Dusty asked for her ashes to be scattered in Ireland but somehow it was decided that some should rest in Henley so that people would have somewhere to visit to pay their respects.
