Thanx Rob - from one of the biogs - (Never heard this story before)

'Two takes were recorded of her #3 1964 UK hit, "I Just Don't Know What To Do with Myself": one being vocal (dynamic, well orchestrated and long) while the other proved to be of lesser stereo quality and was not received well critically, despite its high charting success. Legend has it that she was dissatisfied with the original powerful take of her now-infamous hit, and prompted producers to release the more bland version, due to her constant critiquing of her voice convincing herself the other was far too horrible to be issued.'

I've never heard that story before, it doesn't make a lot of sense, as far as I'm aware, critically, it was exceptionally well received. There are two versions of the song around, more or less the same except for the endings. According to the Complete, there were 30 takes at the recording session.

Am I correct in thinking there are two versions of 'In the Winter', I don't know if it's just me thinking this, but Dusty's voice sounds slightly different on one of them!

I'm sure i read that there are a few different takes of some of the songs. It's like the cameo ones, there are alternate takes for all of the tracks, i'd love to hear them 😊 careful with the boards on IMDB, the comments and people can be a little venomous. It's a cool resource though.

that little extra something to kinda see them through
