It's not in bad taste Clive, not at all. It's of great interest to those of us who like to know the facts of Dusty's life and history. Thank you for your search efforts and keep 'em coming! No doubt Kay's passing did have a great affect on Dusty at an already vulnerable time.

It is interesting and not in bad taste.

It must have been difficult for Dusty at the time being in the USA.

Thanks Clive. I don't find this sort of thing in bad taste.
I spend a lot of my time on the web tracking down my ancesters and find it really fasinating.
I have gone back to 1675 with my family at the moment but still searching..

I love censuses they tell us so much by toggling around the various forms.
Dusty's maternal grandfather's occupation was listed as journalist. This house, number 19 was in a street where number 1 was "Her Majesty's prison"! --only 9 houses away. The prison can't have been huge though as it only had 11 residents at the time of the census.

In addition, the "two non Ryles" women residents were actually listed as domestic servants for the Ryles family. The house at number 19 was a decent size as it was between 7 and 9 rooms and had extensive out buildings, including a stable, coach house, hen house and a turf house (whatever that was?).

Fascinating. Thanks Clive.

Sounds like they were fairly well off. My friend Mary (from Ireland) says a turf house is where the fuel would have been kept -- peat was the fuel--pieces of bog that were dug out of the ground, dried out, and burned. 😊

Oh no! You've got me hooked on family trees again, now I know about the Irish census. My Mum's maiden name was Hanbury and they came from Roscommon a few generations back. I've just been looking and found two families of Hanburys in Roscommon, but I need to work out how they fit in!
